Constitutional Amendment Procedures

International IDEA Constitution-Building Primer 10

Markus Böckenförde
Contents

1. Introduction .......................................................................................................................... 3
   Advantages and risks ............................................................................................................. 3

2. What is the issue? .................................................................................................................. 4

3. Amendment formula: basic design options ................................................................. 6
   Legislative supermajority ........................................................................................................ 6
   Reference to the people (direct democracy and referendums) ........................................ 7
   Double-decision rules .......................................................................................................... 9
   References to states, provinces or regions ............................................................................ 10

4. Further design considerations ............................................................................................ 12
   Amendments versus total revision .................................................................................. 12
   Who should be allowed to initiate a constitutional amendment? .................................. 12
   Should all amendments be subject to the same amendment procedure? ....................... 13
   Should some provisions be unamendable? ...................................................................... 14
   Other restrictions on amendments ................................................................................... 17
   Should there be multiple routes to amendment? ............................................................. 19

5. Contextual considerations ................................................................................................. 21
   Flexibility and rigidity depend on political circumstances .......................................... 21
   Conventional or informal approaches to amendment procedures ............................... 22
   Constitutional change beyond formal amendment ......................................................... 22
1. Introduction

Constitutions need to develop over time to correct provisions that have proven to be inadequate or unworkable, to respond to new needs or changing public demands and to reflect evolving concepts of rights. A living constitution will often change organically, through emerging political conventions and through judicial interpretation.

However, there is also a need for constitutional amendments, which alter the content of a constitutional text in a formal way. Constitutional amendment provisions, regulating the conditions and procedures for such formal amendments, are therefore a near-universal feature of contemporary constitutions.

Advantages and risks

On the one hand, a constitutional amendment process that is too rigid—making formal amendments too difficult—will prevent necessary reforms, ultimately resulting in a constitution that loses both functionality and legitimacy. On the other hand, a constitution that is too flexible—making formal amendments too easy—leaves the constitution and the rights and institutions it establishes vulnerable to erosion by the incumbent government.

For this reason, constitutions need provisions regulating the amendment procedure, in order to allow amendments when, after broad deliberation, there is a sufficient consensus for change, while protecting the constitution from short-sighted or partisan amendments.
A constitution is the supreme law of a country. In contrast to ordinary legislation, it embodies the fundamental choices made by a country and its people that establish the basis for political and social life. Constitutions establish the system of government, distribute and constrain power, protect the rights of citizens and deal with various additional issues of identity or substantive policy that are considered foundational in the specific context of a particular country. However, while intended to be both foundational and enduring, constitutions are not intended to be immutable; if they are to endure, they must be able to respond to changing needs and circumstances.

Motivations for changing the written text of a constitution differ. Amendments may be made to (a) adjust the constitution to the environment within which the political system operates (including economics, technology, international relations, demographics and changes in the values of the population); (b) correct provisions that have proved inadequate over time; or (c) further improve constitutional rights or to strengthen democratic institutions. At other times, changes may be motivated by selfish or partisan goals. Since a constitution sets the rules of the ‘political game’, those in power may be tempted to change the rules to extend or secure their tenure, marginalize the opposition or minorities, or limit civil and political rights. Such changes may weaken, or even undermine, democracy. Similarly, constitutions have to be responsive to changes over time in social mores and values, but they need to be protected against short-term changes or changes hastily approved without due reflection and consideration.

The challenge, then, is to design an amendment process that: (a) allows a constitution to be changed for the public good when necessary, when supported by a sufficient consensus, and after careful consideration; but (b) prevents it from being changed for self-interested, partisan, destructive or short-term motives (see
2. What is the issue?

Box 2.1. An additional challenge, in federal states and in composite societies (where two or more national, ethnic or linguistic communities co-exist), is to design an amendment formula that enables states or communities to protect their rights and to have continuing control over the compact between them.

Box 2.1. Deciding on the framework and acting within the framework ‘Constitutionalism lives on a differentiation between the constitutional level and the level of ordinary law... A constitution determines the principles and procedures for political decisions which are made on the basis and within the framework of the constitution on a day-to-day-basis, and according to the preferences of those who have won elections... If politicians can decide on the framework in the same way they are allowed to act within the framework, the difference between constitution making and law making, and the difference between the constitutions for political decisions and these decisions themselves, disappears. The constitution loses its function... [Thus], constitution making should differ from law making not only in terms of the quorum, but also in terms of actors and procedures’ (Grimm 2000: 39–40).

This Primer is intended to help constitutional drafters achieve this balance between stability and flexibility. As there are many possible amendment procedures, and no best model to follow in all circumstances, it aims to inform the search for appropriate options that fit given contexts. It highlights the questions to consider when drafting amendment clauses, including:

1. What is the difference between constitutional amendments and total revisions?
2. Who should be able to initiate a constitutional amendment?
3. Who should be involved in amending the constitution?
4. What kind of special constraints might be helpful in the constitutional amendment process?
5. Should the public be directly or indirectly involved in the process?
6. Should alternative amendment procedures be available?
7. Should all provisions be subject to the same amendment procedure?
8. What special provisions should be in place for federal or composite societies?
9. Should some provisions be unamendable?
3. Amendment formula: basic design options

Although contemporary constitutions make use of a wide variety of amendment formulas that make the process of amending the constitution more difficult than enacting ordinary laws, most are based on one or more of the following mechanisms: (a) a supermajority rule in the legislature; (b) a referendum; (c) double-decision rules, which may include specified time delays or an intervening election; or (d) the reference to the constituent states, provinces, regions or other territorial units of the polity.

Legislative supermajority

In most constitutional amendment procedures, the legislature needs to pass an amendment law with a greater majority than is required for ordinary legislation. Various degrees of a qualified majority are in place, ranging from an absolute majority (50 per cent of all members plus one) to a four-fifths majority of all members.

The most common qualified-majority formulas are three-fifths (60 per cent) or two-thirds (66.7 per cent) of the membership. These figures are somewhat arbitrary as there is no reason why a 65 per cent or 70 per cent majority could not be used instead. Nevertheless, the principle is that by requiring a larger than usual majority, the incumbent government cannot in normal circumstances unilaterally approve amendments and usually has to negotiate with the opposition or other parties in order to make changes.

Supermajorities come with advantages and disadvantages. On the one hand, they prevent incumbents from easily or unilaterally changing fundamental rules and ensure that any changes are supported by a broad range of the political spectrum. On the other hand, a very high majority allows a small group in the legislature to act as a spoiler, and may make it overly difficult to amend the constitution when necessary.

Defining the supermajority

A three-fifths, two-thirds or three-fourths majority, or any other specified majority, may be defined in two ways—as a fraction of the votes cast (i.e. of the members present and voting) or as a fraction of the total available votes. The latter is the higher threshold, since it counts abstentions, in effect, as negative votes. For example, if in a body of 100 members, a proposal is approved by 60 members and opposed by 20 members, with 20 abstentions, then the requirement for a two-thirds majority of votes cast would be met but a two-thirds majority of the total membership (67) would not be achieved. Without further specification, a supermajority of votes cast could allow a relatively small percentage—perhaps even a minority—of members to approve an amendment, provided that there is no strong opposition. To counteract this, combinations of votes cast and total membership may be used. In India, for example, the requirement for amendments is two-thirds of the votes cast, but these must amount to at least an absolute majority (50 per cent plus one) of the total membership.

Bicameral legislatures

If the national legislature is bicameral, the upper house’s approval is often required as well, even if its approval is not always necessary for ordinary legislation. Majority thresholds may differ here from what is required in the lower house. In Spain, for example, an amendment may be passed either by a three-fifths majority in both houses or by a two-thirds majority in the lower house and an absolute majority in the Senate. In some cases, amendments must be approved by both houses in a joint session (e.g. in Bhutan, a three-fourths majority of the members of parliament in a joint session is needed). In cases where a joint session is held, the real distribution of power depends on the relative sizes of the two houses: if the upper house is small, it may be easily outvoted by the lower house, but if the upper house is large, its members will have a proportionally stronger voice. In some cases, where upper houses are designed to represent particular communities or territories whose constitutional autonomy or special rights have to be protected, it may be important to give the upper house veto power over some or all amendments.

Reference to the people (direct democracy and referendums)

Considering a constitution as the legal and political foundation of a state, its legitimacy needs to derive from the people. This reflects the idea that the people are the source of sovereignty—a basic concept of democratic governance. This doctrine is mirrored by the real involvement of the people in most of today’s constitution-making exercises, be it through a direct election of the members of the constitutional assembly at the beginning of the process and/or a referendum at the end. An amendment procedure may be established with the idea in mind of involving the people in the process as well, as a continuing expression of their ultimate sovereignty.
Constitutional Amendment Procedures

The most direct way to involve the public in amending the constitution is through a referendum, usually following a vote by the legislature. Around 40 per cent of current constitutions make provision for the use of referendums in constitutional amendments, although the specific circumstances in which a referendum may or must be held can vary:

- Some countries demand a referendum for all constitutional amendments, no matter how small, inconsequential or uncontroversial (e.g. Australia, Denmark, Ireland and Japan).

- Some countries require a referendum only if the most fundamental provisions are amended or if the amendment entails a total revision (e.g. Austria, Jamaica, Latvia and Spain).

- In some countries, a referendum is normally required, but there is a procedure by which the legislature—with a very high supermajority—can bypass the need for a referendum. This rule enables minor technical changes, changes which are not controversial, or changes which are very widely recognized as urgent, to proceed without the cost and delay of a referendum.

- An alternative approach allows a minority of the members of the legislature to decide whether an amendment should be subject to a referendum. This power may be exercised by 25 per cent of the members of parliament in Luxembourg and by 33 per cent in Sweden. A slight variation of this approach, adopted in Italy, allows a referendum to be called only if a bill passes with the required majority (50 per cent plus one) but remains below a specified supermajority (66 per cent).

- Non-legislative actors may also be involved in calling a referendum: in Italy, in addition to referendums called by 20 per cent of members of parliament, five regional councils or 500,000 voters may collectively demand a referendum. However, they can only do so, in the Italian case, if the amendment bill has not been passed by a two-thirds majority in both houses of parliament.

- Presidents may have a discretionary authority to refer amendments to the people. If the president can put an amendment before the people at his or her own initiative, this will greatly strengthen presidential power at the expense of the legislature, leading towards ‘hyper-presidentialism’, and such processes are rare in democracies. More usually, the president may refer an amendment to the people only after it has been approved by the legislature. The President of Tunisia, for example, may call a referendum on any proposed amendment after it has been approved by a two-thirds majority in parliament.

Concerns have been raised that a referendum might not be the best way to ensure the constitutional protection of minorities. In response to this concern, some constitutions require not only a nation-wide majority in a referendum but also that the voters in the majority of subunits also vote in favour of a constitutional amendment (Australia, Switzerland) or that the voter turnout be at least 20 per cent in a majority of subunits (Kenya).

The requirements for a referendum should be carefully considered since they also contribute to achieving an adequate balance in terms of how flexible or rigid an amendment is. Having no threshold with regard to voter turnout may mean that a very small percentage of the population might be sufficient for amending the constitution (e.g. in Botswana in 2001, several constitutional amendments were approved on a turnout of less than 5 per cent). On the other hand, a threshold that is too high in terms of voter turnout might be difficult to achieve. Constitutions that have addressed a minimum amount of voter turnout range between 40 per cent (Denmark) and 50 per cent (South Korea) of the electorate.

Required majorities for referendums also differ. In some countries, a majority of more than 50 per cent of the (valid) votes cast is necessary. Again, these rules must be crafted with regard to local circumstances and political conditions. In some places, a 50 per cent turnout may be difficult to achieve if polling places are understaffed, if people have to travel a long way to get to the polls or if electoral registers are not up to date. In some cases, an even higher majority is required (between three-fifths and three-fourths majorities): this may make a provision, in effect, unamendable. Indeed, this may be the intention. In Mauritius, for example, no change to extend the term of office of members of parliament beyond five years may be made unless approved by the unanimous consent of the legislature and by three-fourths of the votes cast in a referendum. For further information on the use of referendums issue see International IDEA Constitution-Building Primer No. 3, Direct Democracy.

Double-decision rules

Time delays

Some constitutions require that a proposed amendment be passed twice, in substantially the same form, with a stated interval—usually three months or 90 days—between them (e.g. Estonia, Italy, Jamaica). The intention of rules is that hasty amendments are avoided, time for reflection is offered and the chances for a public debate are increased.

Intervening general elections
A variation on the double-decision rule requires parliamentary elections to be held between the first approval and final approval of an amendment. This is a widely used formula that may provide an indirect way of involving the people as part of the process for constitutional amendments. Through this process, the constitutional amendment can become part of the electoral campaigns for the legislature. It is left with the individual voter to decide on how far the suggested amendment might impact his/her voting decision. The disadvantage of such an option might be that either the constitutional amendment overshadows other important political issues normally relevant in elections or, in turn, the amendment might be side lined in a general campaign.

- In some countries that rely on intervening elections, draft amendments are put on hold until the next regular elections (e.g. Finland, Greece and Panama).
- In other countries, the legislature is immediately dissolved after adoption of the amendment and new elections held (e.g. Iceland and the Netherlands). In these cases, the usual practice is to limit constitutional proposals until near the end of the projected legislative term, such that an additional, early election is avoided. The effect, then, is not so much to increase the frequency of elections as to limit the frequency of amendments.

Combining double-decision rules with supermajorities
The requirement for an intervening election may be combined with supermajority rules: in the Netherlands, for example, an amendment must be approved twice by parliament, with an intervening general election, and on the second occasion a two-thirds majority vote in both houses is required for the adoption of an amendment.

References to states, provinces or regions
In many federal, decentralized or composite states, the constitution, representing an agreement or compact between the various units, can be amended, in whole or in part, only by the consent of these units or by a specified majority of them. This consent may be expressed through state or provincial legislatures (Canada, India, South Africa and the United States) or through referendums in each of the states (Australia and Switzerland). Where the subunits do not have a direct vote, there is likely instead to be a role for the upper house of parliament, which represents state or provincial interests at the central or federal level (e.g. Germany).

The requirement for a reference to states/provinces may apply only to certain parts of the constitution, such as those dealing with the federal system or respective powers of levels of government.

Think Point 1

What are the most important reasons for making the constitution harder to amend than ordinary laws? Is it to preserve the sovereignty of the people, to protect minorities, to protect ‘constitutional bargains’ between different communities or levels of government or to prevent incumbents from changing the rules and abusing power? How are these different purposes—which may overlap—achieved through different types of amending formulas.
4. Further design considerations

Amendments versus total revision

Some countries (e.g. Austria, Bulgaria, Costa Rica, Nicaragua and Spain) distinguish between a constitutional amendment and a constitutional revision, with the latter often requiring a higher threshold for the adoption of an entirely new constitution compared to a constitutional amendment. Such a distinction follows the assumption that the authority to amend a constitution implies the introduction of adjustments, modifications or changes within the constitution but does not include the power to exchange/replace it or its original structure.

Acknowledging the concept of the people as the pouvoir constituant (the power that creates the constitutional order) in democratic societies, a total revision in these countries usually requires the people’s immediate involvement, either through the election of a constituent assembly (e.g. Bulgaria, Costa Rica and Nicaragua) or via an obligatory referendum (e.g. Austria and Spain).

Who should be allowed to initiate a constitutional amendment?

The right to initiate a constitutional amendment procedure is generally vested in the legislature, and the process of adopting an amendment usually broadly mirrors (albeit with the additional requirements and restrictions discussed in this document) the process for proposing and enacting ordinary laws. In countries with a bicameral legislature, lower houses almost always enjoy the right to initiate the process, as do the majority of upper houses. In some constitutions, a certain number or percentage of members is required in order to initiate an amendment, which may be much higher than the number required to propose an ordinary law.
For example, this figure is set at one-third of the members in Tunisia, one-fourth of the members of either house in Romania. The majority of constitutions also allow other actors to trigger the process. Most prominent in this regard is the executive, be it through the head of state (especially in presidential or semi-presidential systems) or the Ministers.

Occasionally, the highest court in a country might also initiate an amendment (e.g. Guatemala and Panama). The rationale behind including courts in the group of initiators stems from an appreciation of their role as constitutional guardians and from a recognition of their technical expertise in constitutional matters. However, if the courts possess an active power to propose constitutional amendments this may further politicize the judiciary, and may reduce their reputation for impartiality and neutrality.

In about 15 per cent of all countries, the people can propose an amendment if a certain number of voters, usually by means of a petition, make such a request. Such a provision reinforces the idea that a constitution is a living document that springs from the sovereign people and is open to considering the people’s concerns. Since a successful initiation requires a certain amount of prior campaigning, it might also serve as an early indication of the people’s ideas. The number of signatures required to trigger the process varies widely (e.g. 10 per cent of voters in Latvia; 0.3 per cent in Peru), but as a general principle it should be large enough to prevent frivolous proposals, but small enough to have a realistic chance of being used. In Romania, there is an additional threshold in order to prevent initiatives from regional/ethnic groups: in addition to the requirement that 500,000 voters throughout the country support the initiative, at least 20,000 voters in half of the counties in the country must also endorse the initiative.

In federal states, a representative organ of the states, regions or provinces also generally has the right to suggest amendments, be it through the upper legislative chamber at the national level or through one or more parliaments from the subunits (Brazil).

Should all amendments be subject to the same amendment procedure?

In an attempt to identify the right balance between rigidity and flexibility in constitutional amendments, many constitutions offer different thresholds for different parts of the constitution. This may help provide stability, certainty and strong guarantees for some parts of the constitution that need to be more rigid, while allowing flexibility in other areas. For example, the Constitution of Jamaica includes provisions that can be amended by an absolute majority in both houses, ‘entrenched provisions’ that can be amended by a two-thirds majority in both houses, and ‘specially entrenched provisions’ that can be amended by a two-thirds majority in both houses followed by a referendum.
Typically, the provisions requiring a more rigid amendment procedure can include the system and form of government, the type of elections, the integrity of internal borders, the rules for holding referendums, the provision for amending the constitution, national languages, religion, fundamental rights, national values and principles and provisions that affect subnational units and their powers. The choice of which parts of a constitution should be additionally rigid, and the mechanisms for securing that rigidity, depends on the particular situation for each country. Thus, if there is a desire to protect minorities that are geographically concentrated, it may be advantageous to allow sub-national legislatures that represent those minorities to have a veto over amendments. In Canada, for example, amendments concerning language rights cannot be adopted without the consent of all provincial legislatures, or, if the amendment applies to only one or several provinces, of all the provincial legislatures to which the amendment applies. This ensures that language rights in any province cannot be changed without the consent of the legislature of that province. Alternatively, if the desire is to prevent the political elite from undermining basic democratic principles, a referendum requirement for altering provisions (e.g. on the electoral system, franchise or fundamental rights) might be appropriate.

Think Point 2

Which parts of a constitution are most truly fundamental—what are the crucial ground rules that define the state’s identity? Should these be given greater protection from hasty or unilateral amendment? If so, what additional features of the amendment process—higher majorities, a referendum or reference to sub-national units—are most relevant?

Should some provisions be unamendable?

In addition to various degrees of procedural limitation discussed above, some constitutions also place substantive limitations on amendments through a clause that prohibits the amendment of certain provisions. Today, more than 70 constitutions around the world include such unamendable provisions (see Box 4.1). The content of these provisions differs widely from country to country. Examples of immutable provisions include: national unity (Indonesia), the status of religion (Tunisia), the multiparty system (Romania), the democratic or republican form of government (France), electoral rights (Brazil), basic human rights (Germany) and presidential term limits (Honduras).
These provisions are often the result of past traumas. Constitutional drafters in countries emerging from conflict or dictatorship may desire to create a constitutional order that will prevent previous oppressive structures or practices from ever returning. Unamendable provisions might also emerge from a process of transition in order to guarantee fragile bargains reached at that time. For example, some parties to the constitutional negotiation may demand that a constitutional commitment to decentralisation be balanced by an unamendable commitment to the indivisible territorial unity of the state.

Box 4.1. Examples of unamendable provisions

Portugal (article 288):

‘Constitutional revision laws must respect: (a) national independence and the unity of the state; (b) the republican form of government; (c) The separation between church and state; (d) citizens’ rights, freedoms and guarantees; (e) the rights of workers, workers’ committees and trade unions; (f) the coexistence of the public, private and cooperative and social sectors of ownership of the means of production; (g) the existence of economic plans, within the framework of a mixed economy; (h) the appointment of the elected officeholders of the entities that exercise sovereignty, of the organs of the autonomous regions and of local government organs by universal, direct, secret and periodic suffrage; and the proportional representation system; (i) plural expression and political organization, including political parties, and the right of democratic opposition; (j) the separation and interdependence of the entities that exercise sovereignty; (l) the subjection of legal norms to review of their positive constitutionality and of their unconstitutionality by omission; (m) the independence of the courts; (n) the autonomy of local authorities; (o) the political and administrative autonomy of the Azores and Madeira archipelagos.’

Romania (article 152):

‘The provisions of this constitution with regard to the national, independent, unitary and indivisible character of the Romanian State, the republican form of government, territorial integrity, judicial independence, political pluralism and official language shall not be subject to revision. Likewise, no revision will be made if it results in the suppression of the citizens’ fundamental rights and freedoms, or the safeguards thereof.’
The decision to include immutable clauses in a constitution is, however, a delicate one. It comes with considerable side effects and severe consequences that should not be taken lightly:

- By insulating certain principles or provisions from amendment, an intra-constitutional hierarchy is established; the power of the judiciary may be strengthened, because constitutional amendments can themselves be contested in the courts on grounds of constitutionality. In a democratic setting, one might argue, the constituent power belongs to the sovereign people and their freely elected representatives. Entrusting other institutions with a final say about the validity of constitutional amendments (beyond perhaps verifying compliance with formal requirements) would place an unelected and unaccountable body above the constituent power. In some countries, the constitutional court is a recognised part of the amendment process, with responsibility for reviewing proposed amendments before they are voted upon, to ensure that proposed amendments are compatible with the constitution (e.g. Tunisia).

- Vague wording is occasionally used, prohibiting constitutional amendments that run counter to ‘democratic principles’ or the constitution’s general ‘principles and spirit’ but without specifying what these principles are (e.g. Norway). This may allow for greater flexibility, but the effects of such a provision are unpredictable. The resulting ambiguity could further increase judicial at the expense of popular power. The interpretation of such a provision will greatly depend on political circumstances and particularly on the strength of the constitutional culture and on the relative power of the courts and legislature.

- On a theoretical level, there may be concerns about the extent to which we can legitimately bind future generations. The people may waive their right to change their own governing rules, but can they subject future generations to their law without considerably reducing the arena of democratic politics? On a practical level, can we accurately predict future needs? If an unamendable provision becomes untenable and undesirable in the future, it would be impossible to fix the problem without breaking the whole constitutional settlement.

Even where the constitution does not provide for unamendable provisions, the courts in some countries have developed a doctrine that achieves a similar effect. For example, the Supreme Court of India has developed the ‘basic-structure’ doctrine, reasoning that ‘amendments’ to the constitution can take place only in a way that preserves, and is consistent with, the general framework and principles of the constitution as originally adopted. The problem with reliance on judicial mechanisms to define what is unamendable, however, that their decisions may be less legitimate that a clear statement of intent in the constitution.

There is an alternative to unamendable provisions, which is to use different levels of entrenchment as discussed in the previous section. In South Africa, for example, Section 1 of the Constitution outlines four cardinal principles:

1. human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms;
2. non-racialism and non-sexism;
3. supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law; and
4. universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multiparty system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

These are clearly intended to be foundational and integral to the constitutional order. Yet they are not rendered unamendable. Instead, while most of the constitution can be amended by a two-thirds majority in the National Assembly, these provisions can be amended only by a three-fourths majority. By allowing these provisions to be amended–albeit with great difficulty–ultimate control over the constitution rests in democratically elected, rather than judicial hands.

Other restrictions on amendments

Time restrictions after adoption of a new constitution

The first few years following the adoption of a new constitution are critical for its success. Public expectations of change may be high, but the legitimacy of the constitution may be fragile. In these conditions, implementation of the constitution (for example, holding elections, vetting officials, establishing new public bodies, and bringing laws and practices into conformity with the constitution) can be a major challenge. After a period of protracted and potentially divisive constitutional negotiations, especially after a period of conflict or repression, not all stakeholders to the constitution will necessarily feel comfortable with, or bound by, the agreement that has been reached; they might be tempted to introduce retrogressive amendments as soon as the opportunity arises. To reduce this risk, and to allow time for consolidation before changes are considered, some constitutions (e.g. Cabo Verde and Timor-Leste) require a larger supermajority for amendment during the first few years after their adoption. Conversely, constitutions may allow for easier amendment during an initial period, so that drafting or design faults that become apparent during the implementation phase can be rectified. In considering these approaches, the advantages of certainty and stability need to be balanced against the consequent loss of flexibility.

Time restrictions after the most recently adopted amendment

Some constitutions allow amendment only after a specific period of time, usually several years, has elapsed after a previous amendment. In Greece, for example, amendments are not permitted before the lapse of five years from the completion of a previous amendment. Such temporal restrictions may protect the ‘sanctity’ of the constitution, marking it out as a stable and enduring law that is not to be changed for superficial or transient reasons, discouraging excessive tampering or meddling with the constitution and helping instead to focus attention on the consolidation of existing reforms.

However, this comes with the disadvantage of imposing an artificial chronological rigidity, during which even necessary, urgent and uncontroversial amendments are forbidden. To avoid this rigidity, amendments may be made more difficult during these periods, but not absolutely prohibited. For example, Portugal adopts a variation on this model that requires a higher threshold for frequent amendments: amendments may be made, once a period of five years has elapsed since the previous amendment, by a two-thirds majority in parliament, but the requirement for a five-year delay may be waived if the amendment is approved by a four-fifths majority.

Time restrictions after a failed amendment

Some constitutions place restrictions on the adoption of amendments following a failed amendment bill. In Albania, an amendment cannot be adopted (a) within one year of the rejection by parliament of a proposed amendment on the same topic; or (b) within three years of its rejection by a referendum. Such rules may prevent too much legislative time being absorbed by constitutional amendments and may stop the practice of ‘neverendums’ (neverending referendums), where a persistent minority keeps on proposing an amendment to the people until it finally gets its way.

Requirements for public deliberation

There may be a requirement for proposed amendments to be circulated for public consultation before the final vote is taken. This recognizes that constitutional change, because of its fundamental nature, is a matter for deeper and more considered public engagement than ordinary law-making. Kenya’s constitution, for example, requires parliament to publicize any bill to amend the constitution, and to ‘facilitate public discussion about the bill’. The enforceability of these provisions is, however, debatable: what must the government do in order to discharge this duty of consultation? What should the consultation period be? The South African constitution is a little more specific. It requires that proposed amendments be published in the national Government Gazette and circulated for public comment at least 30 days before the amendment bill is introduced. The views of provincial legislatures must also be sought. The written comments of the public and provincial legislatures must then be presented to parliament before the vote.

Restrictions on amendments during states of war, invasion or emergency

Many constitutions prohibit amendments during exceptional times of crisis, like a state of emergency or under the rule of martial law (e.g. Cambodia and Estonia). The reason for this is to prevent amendments taking place under conditions of tension or duress, when those in office may seek to use public fear to usurp additional power, and when opportunities for public deliberation and opposition activity may be limited.

Restrictions on application to incumbents or named individuals

Another type of constraint prevents provisions from being applied to specific individuals: constitutional amendments that address the status of an office or a position do not apply to incumbent officeholders; instead, such amendments only enter into force for those who take up such affected offices/positions after the amendment is passed. For example, an extension of the presidential term limit does not apply to the incumbent president at the time of the amendment (South Korea). This might help to avoid constitutional amendments driven by individuals in government for their own benefit.

Prohibition of implicit and hidden amendments

In several countries, a constitutional amendment can be made only by a bill that must clearly specify that its purpose is to amend the constitution. In Sierra Leone, for example, ‘No Act of Parliament shall be deemed to amend, add to or repeal or in any way alter any of the provisions of this Constitution unless it does so in express terms.’ A similar rule (found in Ghana, Kenya and South Africa, among others) limits constitutional amendment bills to constitutional matters only. This means that a constitutional amendment cannot be hidden in the midst of an otherwise ordinary bill, where it might not be noticed, considered or debated by parliamentarians. The intention of these rules is to ensure that constitutional amendments are given their due importance, are properly debated, and are not made by stealth.

Should there be multiple routes to amendment?

A number of countries offer more than one route to amending certain constitutional provisions. The existence of multiple routes to amendment (which is not to be confused with having different amendment rules for different parts of the constitution, as outlined above) offers a higher degree of flexibility, since an amendment that cannot be passed by one route can, perhaps, be passed by another. Allowing multiple routes to amendment can also make it possible to choose the amendment route that best reflects the content and context of a specific amendment.

In Bulgaria, for example, most constitutional amendments must be adopted by a three-fourths majority in parliament. If this majority is not reached, however, an amendment may be approved by a two-thirds majority, provided that this two-thirds majority is then repeated after an interval of two to five months. Likewise the Finnish Constitution may be amended by a five-sixths majority in a single session, or by a two-thirds majority vote in two successive legislatures with an intervening election. In these cases there is a trade-off between the size of the required supermajority and the ease (in terms of time delays and double-decision rules) with which constitutional decisions can be taken.

Estonia allows for even more flexibility, because it combines the principles found in Bulgaria and Finland with the option of a referendum. An amendment may be passed by (a) a three-fifths majority of parliament followed by a majority vote in a referendum; (b) two successive decisions of parliament with an intervening general election, by a three-fifths majority on the second occasion; or (c) in urgent cases, with the consent of a four-fifths majority of the members of parliament in a single session. Thus, for instance, contested and fundamental questions can be decided by referendum, while technical and uncontroversial amendments might be made by a parliamentary supermajority.

In the United States, the usual method of amendment requires approval by a two-thirds majority in both legislative chambers and ratification by a three-fourths majority of the states. The other method is to hold a constitutional convention (a specially elected body assembled to make constitutional amendments, which can be called by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states). Although a constitutional convention has not been held at the federal level since 1789, the fact that there is another route to amendment, outside of Congress, has been used to push for reforms.

Kenya also permits an additional bottom-up route for constitutional amendments (amendment by popular initiative). Initiated by at least a million voters and approved by a majority of counties, the draft bill is submitted to a referendum if not accepted by the national legislature.

If multiple amendment routes are possible, it is important to consider who has the right to choose between them. In France, for example, the constitution can be amended either by referendum or by a three-fifths majority in a joint session of both houses of parliament, but it is the president who chooses, in the case of amendments proposed by the government, which of these routes to take.
5. Contextual considerations

Flexibility and rigidity depend on political circumstances

In the abstract, it is hard to prescribe a suitable amendment formula that will strike an appropriate balance between rigidity and flexibility. Not only must the amendment formula reflect the specific needs and circumstances of each jurisdiction, but similar amendment formulas may generate different results in different cases, depending on the political culture, the political system and the history of the country in question. In other words, formal amendment rules do not necessarily reflect the actual difficulty of effecting change.

- For example, in parliamentary systems, where the prime minister leads and is responsible to parliament, the real initiative to amend the constitution is often taken by the executive, even if the procedure is formally supposed to start in parliament.

- Depending on the electoral system and the number of significant political parties, a given supermajority requirement may be hard to achieve in some countries, whereas the same threshold might not be a high barrier for amending the constitution in other countries. Thus, for example, a two-thirds majority requirement is likely to be much more difficult hurdle to reach in a country like the Netherlands, with a proportional electoral system and multiparty politics, than in a country like Saint Lucia, with a small parliament elected by plurality vote.

- A major determinant of the real rigidity or flexibility of a constitution is the political culture that surrounds it. In some countries, the constitution is revered as the foundation of the nation, and all proposals for change are handled cautiously. In others, there is a habit of making frequent changes to keep the constitution up to date.
Constitutional Amendment Procedures

Conventional or informal approaches to amendment procedures

The formal amendment procedures outlined in a constitution only define the legal process that must be completed in order to make an amendment. The political process necessary to generate legitimacy and support for an amendment may differ from this.

In Slovakia, for example, the constitution is very easy to amend, requiring only a three-fifths majority vote in the single-chamber parliament, with no requirement for an intervening election or cooling-off period. The constitution does not require referendums on constitutional changes. In practice, however, advisory referendums—which are not legally binding but are politically persuasive—have, on several occasions, been held before making substantial changes to the constitution. Although there is no legal requirement, some scholars (e.g. Blokker 2013) argue that there is now an informal expectation that a referendum should be held before adopting major amendments.

In Ireland, the constitution can be amended by a parliamentary decision, adopted in the same way as an ordinary law, followed by the approval of a majority of votes cast in a referendum. Nevertheless, a constitutional convention was established in 2012 in response to public demands for constitutional change, with one-third of its members being members of parliament and two-thirds being selected by random lot from among citizens. The convention was tasked with preparing proposals for amendment, although the decision to adopt these proposals was to be made according to the formal amendment rules.

The level of detail and specificity in a constitution is also relevant: if constitutions provide many detailed prescriptions of specific policies, these rules may become more obsolete over time and thus require more frequent amendments; the less fundamental the provisions of a constitution are, the easier they should be to amend.

Constitutional change beyond formal amendment

In countries with a system of constitutional review, the content and the meaning of some constitutional provisions and concepts are not only changed through constitutional amendments, but also adjusted through constitutional interpretation. In general, the more difficult it is to formally amend the constitution, the more likely it is that adjustments will be made through judicial interpretation. For example, due to the political landscape and the rather rigid requirements of the amendment procedure, the US Constitution has been formally amended on only 16 separate occasions (resulting in 27 amendments altogether) during the last 224 years. In contrast, the US Supreme Court’s interpretation of the constitution and some of its provisions have changed frequently over time, thereby altering the meaning of the fundamental text, especially in areas where the constitution is vague.

Judicial review is not the only way by which constitutions can mutate: relations between institutions, such as presidents and prime ministers, may depend as much on political practice and even personal charisma as on constitutional rules. Other rules, such as electoral laws or the procedural rules of legislatures, may also affect constitutional practice and operation, without themselves being part of the constitution. In the Netherlands, for example, a change to the process of ministerial appointments (government formation) to limit the role of the king and increase that of parliament was brought about by means of a change in parliament’s standing orders, without requiring formal constitutional change.
6. Decision-making questions

1. How rigid should a constitution be? How strong is the desire to ensure that a constitution cannot be easily, unilaterally or hastily amended? How strong is the desire to allow flexibility?

2. Can the tension between these desires be resolved by making some parts of a constitution harder to amend than other parts? Are there particular parts of a constitution that demand special entrenchment?

3. What role should the people have in consenting to constitutional amendments? Do you want the people to have the final word or politicians? What risks (e.g. polarization) might be associated with the use of referendums, and how might these be mitigated?

4. How can the needs of particular provinces/territories/states/communities, etc. be protected? Should they have a veto, individually or collectively, over amendments concerning their own powers?

5. What other actors/institutions should be involved in the amendment process (e.g. the head of state, an upper house)? How might their role in the amendment process strengthen or weaken their overall position in the balance of powers?

6. What is the party-political context (e.g. one dominant party; two strong, disciplined parties; several small parties)? How broad a coalition would be needed, under current and foreseeable political conditions, to achieve an absolute majority, a three-fifths majority, a two-thirds majority, or a three-fourths majority, in the legislature?
7. Examples

Table 7.1. Constitutional amendments procedures

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Country</th>
<th>How are proposed amendments initiated?</th>
<th>Legislative approval rules</th>
<th>Other approval rules</th>
<th>Comments</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Australia</td>
<td>Introduced in parliament in a manner similar to an ordinary bill</td>
<td>Passed by an absolute majority in each house (or with consent of the government if passed by an absolute majority in one house twice after a three-month interval)</td>
<td>Approval by the people in a referendum</td>
<td>Must be approved by (a) a majority of electors in a majority of the states (i.e. 4 of 6 states); and (b) a majority of total votes cast (including the territories as well as states)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Country</td>
<td>How are proposed amendments initiated?</td>
<td>Legislative approval rules</td>
<td>Other approval rules</td>
<td>Comments</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chile</td>
<td>Introduced to Congress in a manner similar to an ordinary bill</td>
<td>Three-fifths majority of total membership of Chamber of Deputies and Senate</td>
<td>If the president rejects an amendment proposal, the Congress may insist on the amendment by the same majority as that required to approve it. The president may refer a proposed amendment to the people in a referendum.</td>
<td>Historically, it has been made more rigid in practice by the existence of a binomial electoral system that overrepresents the main opposition bloc, making it harder to achieve a supermajority.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chile</td>
<td>Presidential republic</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>India</td>
<td>Introduced in parliament in a manner similar to an ordinary bill</td>
<td>Passed by two-thirds of the members present and voting (being at least an absolute majority of the total membership) in each house</td>
<td>Amendments relating to the election of the president, the judiciary, the powers of federal and state legislatures, and the relationship between the central government and the states must also be approved by a majority of the state legislatures.</td>
<td>Courts have developed a &quot;basic structure&quot; doctrine: no amendment may deviate from the basic structure of the federal, republican, democratic, secular Constitution.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>India</td>
<td>Parliamentary republic</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>India</td>
<td>Federal</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>India</td>
<td>Bicameral</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxembourg</td>
<td>Introduced in parliament in a manner similar to an ordinary bill</td>
<td>Two successive votes at intervals of at least three months; two-thirds majority vote of total membership required</td>
<td>Second vote in the legislature can be replaced by a referendum at the request of one-quarter of the members of parliament or 25,000 citizens; referendum decided by majority vote.</td>
<td>No amendment concerning the grand duke or order of succession may be made during a regency.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxembourg</td>
<td>Parliamentary constitutional monarchy</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxembourg</td>
<td>Unitary</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxembourg</td>
<td>Unicameral</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxembourg</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
7. Examples

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Country</th>
<th>How are proposed amendments initiated?</th>
<th>Legislative approval rules</th>
<th>Other approval rules</th>
<th>Comments</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Mauritius</td>
<td>Introduced in parliament in a manner similar to an ordinary bill</td>
<td>Amendments concerning structure and composition of state institutions (presidency, parliament, Council of Ministers, the judiciary), electoral system, rights and freedoms, and fourth-branch institutions must be approved by a three-quarters majority vote in parliament; other amendments approved by two-thirds majority vote</td>
<td></td>
<td>Amendments to extend parliament's term of office beyond five years must be approved by an unanimous vote of parliament followed by a three-quarters majority in a referendum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Democracy since 1968</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parliamentary republic</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unitary (with autonomous area)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unicameral</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poland</td>
<td>Proposed by one-fifth of the number of deputies, by the Senate, or by the president</td>
<td>Passed by a two-thirds majority of votes cast by the Sejm (lower house) and by an absolute majority of votes cast in the Senate; amendments on structure and principles of the republic (Chapter 1), rights and freedoms (Chapter 2), or the amendment process itself are subject to a delay of at least 60 days between first reading and adoption</td>
<td>Amendments specified in previous column may be subject to a confirmatory referendum if requested by one-fifth of the number of deputies, the Senate, or the president; amendment is accepted if approved by a majority of votes cast</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Democracy since 1990</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Semi-presidential republic</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unitary</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bicameral</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tunisia</td>
<td>May be proposed by the president, one-third of the members of the legislature; amendments proposed by the president have priority</td>
<td>Amendments must be approved by a two-thirds majority of the members of the legislature</td>
<td>The president may submit an amendment that has been approved by the legislature to the people in a referendum; it is adopted if approved by a majority of the votes cast</td>
<td>Speaker of the legislature refers proposed amendments to Constitutional Court before they are voted on by legislature to ensure they do not change unamendable provisions (on e.g. number/length of presidential terms, basic definitions of the state and the 'civil state' principle)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Transitioning to democracy since 2011</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Semi-presidential republic</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unitary</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Unicameral</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Where to find constitutions referred to in this Primer

The constitutional texts referred to in this Primer, unless otherwise stated, are drawn from the website of the Constitute Project, <https://www.constituteproject.org/>.

Twomey, A., ‘The involvement of sub-national entities in direct and indirect constitutional amendment within federations’, Unpublished paper delivered at the 7th World Congress of the International Association of Constitutional Law, 11–15 June 2007, Athens
Annex

About the author

Markus Böckenförde is currently the Leader of the Advisory Team to the Policy Planning Staff at the German Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation and Development and a Senior Researcher at the German Development Institute. From 2009 until April 2011 he was a Programme Officer and in part Acting Programme Manager for the Constitution-Building Processes Programme at International IDEA. Before joining International IDEA, he was the Head of the Africa Projects and a Senior Research Fellow at the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law in Heidelberg, Germany.

About International IDEA

The International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (International IDEA) is an intergovernmental organization with a mission to support sustainable democracy worldwide by providing comparative knowledge, assisting in democratic reform, and influencing policies and politics.

Based in Stockholm, Sweden, it has offices in Africa, the Asia-Pacific, Europe, and Latin America and the Caribbean. International IDEA is a Permanent Observer to the United Nations.

<http://www.idea.int>
About this series

An ongoing series, International IDEA’s Constitution-Building Primers aim to explain complex constitutional issues in a quick and easy way.

1. What is a Constitution? Principles and Concepts*
2. Bicameralism^*
3. Direct Democracy*
4. Judicial Appointments*
5. Judicial Tenure, Removal, Immunity and Accountability
6. Non-Executive Presidents in Parliamentary Democracies*^*
7. Constitutional Monarchs in Parliamentary Democracies^*
8. Religion–State Relations^*
9. Social and Economic Rights^*
10. Constitutional Amendment Procedures
11. Limitation Clauses^*
12. Federalism^^
13. Local Democracy^*
14. Presidential Veto Powers^*
15. Presidential Legislative Powers
16. Dissolution of Parliament
17. Government Formation and Removal Mechanisms
18. Emergency Powers
19. Fourth-Branch Institutions
20. Constitutional Recognition of Political Parties

^ Also available in Arabic
* Also available in Myanmar

Download the Primers from our website: <http://www.idea.int/publications>. An updated list of Primers is available at <http://constitutionnet.org/primers>.
International IDEA’s Constitution-Building Primers are designed to assist in-country constitution-building or constitutional-reform processes by helping citizens, political parties, civil society organizations, public officials and members of constituent assemblies make wise constitutional choices.

They also provide guidance for staff of intergovernmental organizations and other external actors working to provide well-informed, context-relevant support to local decision-makers.

Each Primer is written as an introduction for non-specialist readers, and as a convenient aide-memoire for those with prior knowledge of, or experience with, constitution-building. Arranged thematically around the practical choices faced by constitution-builders, the Primers aim to explain complex constitutional issues in a quick and easy way.